my android phone is slow after update

Curious about which Android OEMs are fastest and slowest in releasing Android updates? It's the phone manufacturers who need an eye on it. | Jewel Samad/Getty Images Slow Android updates are one of the worst things about smartphones running the Android operating system. Fragmentation is a notoriously big problem for Android, and Google's update system for Android is famously broken. Many Android users have to wait months to get the latest version of Android, even if their phones are only a year or two old, finding themselves wondering if they will ever get critical Android updates. The big problem with this situation is that Android updates do more than just add new features and target the way the operating system looks and works (though that's a pretty big advantage to miss). Android updates also carry critical fixes for large security vulnerabilities, incorporate fixes for bugs, and add code that will improve device performance. And because many new apps require an up-to-date version of Android, android updates are the ones that allow users with older phones to run new apps and keep the apps they've been using for years stable. Some phone manufacturers are better at delivering Android updates on time than others. So what can you do if you're a big Android fan looking for a new phone, but don't want to end up with a phone that OEM isn't updating? You need to find out which phone manufacturers are good at offering fast Android updates, and which ones aren't very good at it. Fortunately, it's pretty easy to know which OEMs you should consider based on how phone manufacturers handled the Android 6.0 update. Read on to see which phone manufacturers have the best track record of providing fast Android updates, and which ones you should stay away from when you purchase your next smartphone. 1. Google: Fastest Google Nexus Android Updates | Justin Sullivan/Getty Images If fast Android updates are your top priority, then purchasing a Google Nexus device is thoughtless. Nexus devices always get the latest Android updates on the day they were released, and they offer the purest form of Android without the custom bloatware and skins that phone manufacturers and providers view. Nexus phones are the first devices to receive Android updates, and are not subject to the very long certification processes that stretch between vendor providers and OEMs. As J.R. Raphael reported for Computerworld on the Android Update report card for Marshmallow, Gol is not technically an Android smartphone manufacturer, but as the driving force behind the Nexus device line and the sole provider of upgrades for these devices, it serves the same practical role for users concerned about when they will receive Android updates. The Nexus 5X and Nexus 6P shipped with marshmallows has been installed, and some owners of the Nexus 6 received the same update on the day that the software was officially released. However, Rafael points out that Google's communications could be better, as the company These are users who won't get the update in the first wave of launches in the dark like when they'll be able to upgrade marshmallows. However, choosing a Nexus device is still by far the most reliable way to get regular updates on time, if not always immediately, in a way. 2. Motorola: Motorola Fast Android Updates | Paul Zimmerman/Getty Images According to Apteligent's 2016 report (PDF), summarizing the group comparison of the time it took to upgrade from Android 5.x Lollipop to Android 6.0 Marshmallow on a variety of different smartphones in the United States, Motorola was the first phone maker to issue marshmallow updates after releasing the operating system in early October 2015. It was also quick to offer Android Nougat upgrades for some of its Moto Z line. Our data shows that device manufacturers have grouped into two groups: those that pushed the update three months after release and those waiting longer - just over five months. Motorola was the first to issue Android updates for Marshmallow, and tried the first update on a small set of devices including the Pure Moto X Edition and Moto X Style for about two months before rolling them out more widely. Apteligent recommends that users who want to optimize for stability and update speed consider a Motorola smartphone as their next purchase. Computerworld, on the other hand, criticized Motorola for moving from the shining example to what the Android device manufacturer should be to bitter disappointment that Android fans won't soon forgive. What's the problem? Although she did a reasonable job (though nowhere near the standard she once maintained) for getting Android 6.0 for her current and former flagship regulars, she did so with one big asterisk: the complete abandonment of all the 2014 device's top models. Worse, the company offered no explanation for the choice, and did not apologize to users who trusted its promise of regular, reliable Android updates. 3. LG: LG Fast Android Updates | David Ramos/Getty Images LG is another phone maker that has been quick to release Android updates and came second behind Motorola and gets marshmallow updates out the door. The company took the same approach as Motorola in preparing updates to android marshmallows. It tested the first update on the LG G4 for about a month before releasing the update for other models. Apteligent notes that LG has a history of getting OS releasing the door quickly, and the group recommends choosing an LG smartphone if you want to be one of the first users of a new version of Android. Computerworld notes that while LG has traditionally been terrible when it comes to Android upgrade reliability, the company has gradually improved in recent years. Just as it did with the Update to Android 5.0, LG was able to release the update to Android 6.0 for some of its phones pretty quickly. But Rafael reports rushing out. In what was actually a one-country small-scale immersion test it's not the same as actually getting it into the hands of most consumers, which was particularly stringent for American consumers, who heard about LG rolling out the update in Poland and then had to wait months for it to arrive in the U.S. LG also failed to provide pending users with much information during the update process, which didn't make waiting any easier. 4. HTC: HTC Fast Android Updates | David Ramos/Getty Images HTC released Android updates for Marshmallow immediately after LG, but much faster than many other phone manufacturers. Instead of following the gradual strategy employed by Motorola and LG, HTC took a different approach. Apteligent reports that HTC basically just pushed the release to all compatible devices from the start. While HTC's cycle time when it comes to Android updates can get a little faster, it's one of the best manufacturers in terms of keeping users in the loop about when they can expect an update for each variation model. In Rafael's estimation, HTC is doing pretty well and continues to make impressive improvements in its upgrade delivery time. However, the speed at which one HTC's M9 received the Android Marshmallow update is a good demonstration of why it's always better to go with the unlocked version of a phone rather than a carrier locked model. The unlocked version of LG's flagship received the update in December, while Android updates for the phone provider's locked phone versions didn't start coming out until February. ZTE | Lluís Gene/AFP/Getty Images HTC is the latest carrier you can quickly consider on deploying Android updates. The next carrier in line was ZTE, which released its first marshmallow updates about two months after HTC's updates. Even with the next version of Android just around the corner, ZTE has released the Android update on only a handful of devices. It started by releasing the update for its Axon line of devices in February 2016. Android Police noted when the update was released that ZTE had spent the past few years building low-cost devices for suppliers. But when it released the Axon Pro in 2015, it promised to keep the device up to date. Although it took ZTE a little longer than expected to fulfill that promise, the manufacturer did deliver and was able to update its flagship device. 6. Sony: Sony Slow Android Updates | David Ramos/Getty Images Sony and Samsung started on releasing marshmallow updates shortly after ZTE. But by the time Sonny started, she waited more than five months after Marshmallow's release to issue Android updates for her compatible devices. Along with Samsung, Sony is consistently among the slowest phone manufacturers to start rolling out Android updates. In addition, Sony Xperia users who were excited to hear that Android updates were on their way were subsequently disappointed by the realization that only specific versions of Devices have been configured to receive the update on the initial downtime. Although Sony allowed some users to join the beta marshmallow program, it was only models with specific model numbers that were eligible. Customers who used one of Sony's three flagship devices that had different product codes had to keep waiting, though Sony did not provide any information about how long users had to wait. 7. Samsung: Slow Android Updates Samsung | Drew Angerer/Getty Images Like Sony, Samsung waited more than five months to release the update to compatible devices. Raphael notes that although Samsung has two smartphone lines equal to the flagship status - the Galaxy S and galaxy note - it has waited more than five months to roll the update to none of its flagship rosters over time. Five months is way too long for the current flag-raising to get a major upgrade of the operating system. Things would be even worse if you were waiting for an update to the flagship danger of Samsung's previous generation, and it still wouldn't be great even if you had an unlocked version of the flagship of the current generation. And according to Computerworld, Samsung appears to have a policy of keeping its customers completely in the dark about its upgrade plans and progress. Once upon a time, the company did provide detailed information about these things - but having repeatedly failed in its promises... Samsung sealed its corporate lips in a strong closure.
